Rev. H. W. Bellows's Lecture before the Mcreantile Library Association last evening was as I told you in my last. Since then, a communi possessions, and it was utterly a suicidal policy for moon, and was so hadly injured that faint hopes are one of the very best which has enchained and instructed an audience this win er. Its subject was the Capacity of Man for Education, and its fundamental proposition that every rational human being possesses an unbounded capacity for intellectual culture and improvement, in contradistinction from the lower animals, whose faculties are only capable of improvement to an exceedingly limited extent. From this established truth (which he forcibly illustrated) the Lecturer deduced that interminable Progress is the great law of Man's nature and the chief element of his history; and that Education is the proper end of his being, without exception of rank or sex, or condition-Education, not in the measure and barren sense in which it is generally takennot mere Reading, Writing, Grammar, &c. but the barmonious and full development of all his faculties the unfolding of his spiritual nature. In compariso with this, all other objects of human effort are in significant; he who neglects this for the acquirement of wealth, or power, or honors, or the gratifi cation of his senses, is guilty of treason against himself-of moral snicide.

Mr. B.'s criticism of Education, commonly so ting that the elementary branches are necessary, as the tools with which true Education is to be wrought out, he contended that the end kept ever in view should be the acquirement of ideas, no words-of things, not names. Much of the time now devoted to study, whesher in school or col lege, is nearly thrown away. Our children and youth should be taught astronemy, chemistry, the laws of light and heat, &c. &c. rather than grammar, rhetoric and languages, especially dead ones Better ten ideas and but one expression for them than ten words and but one idea. Mr. B. strongly deprecated the distinction of educated and uneducated classes.
